Italy has always been , in the distant past trade , the country of the professional guilds : unions professionals who supported each other to achieve mutual benefits . Our cities all have a "way of Merchants" , " street of goldsmiths " and many others like it , because for hundreds of years it was understood that the concentration of activity " sisters " in the same neighborhood or in the same street is economically and socially convenient.

In almost all the cities of Europe and the world things have remained so , and there are whole districts citizens dedicated to the commercial sector. In Italy in recent decades there has been instead the decentralization of business because retailers have been afraid of competition and instead feel stimulated to do more and more , they raised barricades. The Italian law has gone along with this trend the removal, often imposing distance constraints between similar stores .

Stay together attracts customers , stimulates imagination and creativity , protects young entrepreneurs can learn from the most experienced emulating them , regulates prices . In one district sector, otherwise the aggregation of the shops in a shopping center , the profits do not go music with the franchisee or the manager of the center, but all enter into the pockets of the shopkeeper . In addition, but no less important , the location of a shopping street is usually in the center of the city and not relegated to the periphery as in a large multi-store center . This increases the prestige stores , the volume of customers and the target number of visitors .

Fortunately, today things are changing in Italy and the corners of the city back to be characterized by sales categories . In Milan, for example, next to Via Montenapoleone , the fashion district, between via and via Uptown Speronari has developed the way of Taste.
